About

Dr Anith Chacko is a diagnostic radiologist and the founder and CEO of the Radiant Group. He holds a PhD from the University of Bristol, completed medical school with distinction, and served as a lead radiologist at Life Healthcare before building RDISA, a national mobile screening network that has grown from one truck in 2023 to more than 300 communities and over 22 000 women screened, detecting more than 425 cancers. Through the Radiant Foundation he sponsors mammograms for women who cannot afford screening. He is the inaugural SAMA Young Researcher of the Year and has published widely in peer-reviewed journals.

What he speaks about

- Healthcare access as infrastructure
Why screening fails at the system level rather than the clinical level, and what an infrastructure mindset changes about funding, building and measuring preventive care.
- Scaling care on wheels
The mechanics of a national mobile screening network: one truck in 2023, more than 300 communities, 22 000 women screened and 425 cancers detected since, and the operational lessons collected on the way.
- The patient at the centre of the system
What clinicians, employers and health systems get wrong about the women they are trying to reach, and how trust gets earned in the field.
